SCENARIO 3 - BRIEFING

COLE'S CHARGE, JUNE 11

While taking control of the road from Isigny, Lieutenant Colonel Robert G. Cole remarks that Carentan's surroundings are always locked by a strategic point of resistance. An unknown number of German paratroopers are entrenched in a farm, preventing a direct approach on the town. You must remove them from this position. A bayonet charge seems like the only option. Cole leads his men to death or glory!

LT COLONEL ROBERT COLE

Private Johnson had never been considered particularly lucky. He was not very superstitious. At least, no more than most paratroopers. But that was before. Before all these signs. Like, for example, when his stick was swapped with the one from Sergeant Fitzpatrick's squad, all because Fitzpatrick knew the pilot, who it seems was good luck... Their Skytrain was shot down by Flak before they even had time to open the door so they could blow those guys away.

And then there was that perfect jump, not a single scratch, nothing lost along the way.

And that mine: While marching along, he ripped the wire right out without triggering it.

The assault on the fortified post on the way off Utah Beach, when the kraut's MG 34 had jammed at the exact moment in which Johnson noticed that the gunner had spotted him trying to charge him... That scared the crap out of him! What if he'd been that poor bastard?

He also remembered that mortar shell at his feet that hadn't exploded, and the time he was hit, but the bullet was stopped clean by the stock of his M1...

And then when he turned his back to Lieutenant Idol, head of Able Company, who handed him his helmet that hed lost without knowing why. The helmet had been pierced right through by a bullet that somehow hadn't touched his head! Just as Johnson was starting to tell himself how lucky he was, his luck ran out. There he was, with his nose in the mud, with his buddies in Company A of the 1st / 502nd of the 101st, pinned down by heavy fire from those boche bastards entrenched in this frigging Ingouf farm. Seriously, that was it was called!

And then the smoke shells started to fall on the farm and its defenders, drowning them in the fog. Then he saw... He saw Lt. Colonel Cole get up, Colt .45 in one hand and whistle in the other. He heard him give the order to fix bayonets, he heard the whistle and Cole yelling, "Chaaaaarge!"

He told himself that this, this would be the time.
