The platoon has received orders to blow up a German HQ. They have been equipped with explosives and a detonator. But, during the approach, combat has separated the platoon into two groups. One had to make a detour to the west, while the other had to veer eastward. The dumbest thing about this situation is that one group has the explosives, and the other one has the detonator. We'll have to find the target in order to hook everything up to blow everything up...
Maybe the Germans will just let us do our job?

Battlefield and Deployment

The German player deploys his units in the German deployment zone. The American player positions Group 1 to the west, and Group 2 to the east.
One unit of Group 1 carries the explosives, while one unit of Group 2 carries the detonator.
The American player chooses the two units.

Without looking, randomly select 2 Bonus tactics markers, setting aside this marker and place them on the battlefield.

Place the American objective in the house.

For this scenario, you are not allowed to destroy the house.

Remove the Artillery and Airstrike cards from both decks and Speed set up (US).

The German player has the initiative.
Therefore, he deploys first. Place the corresponding marker on space 1 of the turn counter.
Each player draws 4 cards.

Victory Conditions and Particular Information:

This game lasts 6 turns.
If the unit carrying one of the items is eliminated, it drops the object it was carrying onto an adjacent interspace of his choice.
In order to reclaim an item, you must stop on one of the spaces adjacent to its interspace.

The American player must, before the end of the sixth turn, bring the explosives and the detonator into the house. If at the end of a Supply phase, both of these items are simultaneously present in the building, and the American player has at least one unit there, a German unit being present or not, he wins the game.
If he does not get there, or the German player eliminates all the enemy infantry units (thus there are no more American units that can transport one item or the other), he is declared the victor.
