PEGASUS BRIDGE

Scenarios Pack (2015)

The gliders for Operation Deadstick are in position around the River Orne. There are two bridges to seize: the Bénouville bridge, and the Ranville bridge. The paratroopers of the British 6th Airborne Division are headed toward their respective objectives on this summer night. Will you be able to lead your men into battle and capture these two bridges? Or can you prevent the Red Devils from opening the passage to the Allied armies that will be landing a few hours later on the beaches of Normandy?

A CROCODILE ON THE BEACH

Hitting a well-defended and prepared beach is not an easy task. In the early days of World War Two, the Allies had gathered abundant evidence that storming a beach without the right preparations was close to suicide. During Operation Rutter, the Allied "raid" on the French port of Dieppe, more than six thousand Allied troops, most of them Canadians, were virtually wiped out as a series of errors and bad decisions led the assault into the teeth of German machinegun and close support fire. The Luftwaffe ruled the air over the beach, and the Allied forces were horribly unprepared for an attack on buildings lining the invasion beaches.

In the Allied high command, and particularly among the British staff, there was a great deal of interest in finding ways to support an invasion across a fortified beach. Although most light tanks of the time had been able to be landed at Dieppe, they had quickly been destroyed on the beaches, and contributed nothing to the landing. What was needed was a series of heavier, more specialized tanks that could handle the unique problems of beach sand, small stone shingles, invasion obstacles, and enemy fire.

Major General Percy Hobart, an early convert to tank warfare who had transferred into the branch in 1923, had already earned a lot of respect for his North African forces, nicknamed the Desert Rats. An unconventional thinker who had studied literature prior to joining the Army, Hobart was the right man to put in charge of developing these new forces. With energy and ingenuity, Hobart and his engineers began churning out dozens of designs for specialty tanks called «Funnies» for the upcoming Normandy invasion.

COLIN MAUD, ANIMAL LOVER?

It is not only because he disembarked on a beach so swept by machine gun fire that he had to all but abandon his dog along the way. Man's best friend has his place in the middle of the battlefield. Indeed, he can flourish among the mortar explosions and the groans of the wounded.

This is what we can learn from the incredible story of Colin and Winnie:

June 6, 1944: Colin is the Beach Master, the man in charge of organizing the logistics on Juno Beach. He decides to take Winnie with him to visit Normandy. History does not tell us how many German butts Winnie bit, or whether Colin brought a stock of doggie treats. But this much is certain: this single turn of events helped make Colin Maud one of the most popular officers of the British Navy.
