South of Wickerschwihr, France, January 27th 1945: Since early December, the 1st French Army has been pinned by fierce resistance from the 19th German Army, before Colmar. At the end of January 1945, the French launch a general attack to suppress the Colmar bulge. The 2nd army corps is in charge of cleaning out the city, with the help of American troops from the 21st corps. First objective ; the Colmar canal at the east. The Americans quickly stall. General Monsabert then sends reinforcements, with the 4th Tactical group (5th Armored Division) which needs to cross the canal to push further to the South. The sub-group A is first in line, aiming at the Wickerschwihr bridge. The Bethouard platoon, along with a French legion platoon, arrives at the canal first. A patrol informs that the bridge has been damaged. It cannot be used by vehicles but infantry can get across. The French take their positions, waiting for the rest of the sub-group. A German company approaches, coming from Bischwihr.

EPILOGUE :

Les Allemands, vétus de blancs, s'approchent du canal l'arme à la bretelle. A 400m les Français ouvrent le feu, jetant la confusion dans les rangs ennemis et les obligeant à se mettre à couvert. Un tir de mortier venant de Bischwihr s'abat sur les cuirassiers et les légionnaires. Les Allemands tentent alors de repartir a l'assaut et infiltre la rive nord du canal. L'intervention d'un blindé allemand ne suffit pas a renverser le cours du combat.
Les Français gardent le contrôle du terrain et accueillent vers 16h les premiers détachements américains. Les défenseurs ont réussi a tenir leurs positions sans autre perte qu'un char légèrement endommagé.
