THE GIRAFFE HAS A LONG NECK!

Western Front
June 1944

Cressensac, 8th of June, 1944

After it had become clear that the landings were not a mere diversion, 2. SS-Panzer-Division "Das Reich" was ordered to the front in Normandie at once. The haphazard composition of their convoys clearly reflected the urgency of the matter. Hardly anything could be more aggravating to the Germans, renowned for their thoroughness, than having to witness a military organisation that somehow reminds one of a Circus parade. Certainly, the SS did not see any humour in the situation.

At Montauban, the regiment "Der Führer" is to meet up with a divisional recon unit that has to scout and secure the route. After fruitless waiting and pressed for time, Standartenführer Stalder orders his command section to get going...

EPILOGUE

"Message important pour Nestor : la girafe a un long cou."

The maquis du Limousin has finally received the long awaited coded message from London, urging them to disrupt enemy plans and organization by harassing the foe to the max. How? Wreaking havoc upon a convoy is a good start and the Resistance has some scores to settle…

Near the town of Cressensac, machine gun fire brings the German vehicles abruptly to a standstill. Though shots are exchanged, most of the Boche are pinned down by the sustained fire from the maquisards.

Major Wulf's armored vehicles come to the rescue. As his men see the officers and secretaries clinging to the ground with their face in a gutter, they are amused. Briefly amused… The French immediately let them know they are not welcome. Nonetheless, the tide of battle is turned and the FFI deems it wise to disengage from the skirmish. After the hold-up, the Waffen-SS units start to move again, properly this time, with a recon unit leading the way.
