THE TINY TOWN TANK TRASHING

Western Front
June 1944

Lingèvres, 14th of June, 1944

During an offensive to outflank and surround the defenders of Caen, elements of the 50th Infantry Division and the 8th Armoured Brigade seize the town of Lingèvres. Unfortunately for them, the Panzer Lehr Division, by now quite accustomed to Normandie, has no intention whatsoever to leave it at that.

Three hours after they fell back, the Germans launch a counter-attack.

EPILOGUE

The Panzergrenadiers attack from the South, supported by Panzers on both flanks. When the Germans reach the outskirts of the town, chaotic combat ensues. Confusion reigns. The tanks battle it out at point-blank range. Clearly, none of the vehicles were designed for such close quarters action.

The whole affair resembles “The gunfight at the OK corral”... with steel behemoths rather than gunslingers of the Old West.

One commander, forced from the battlefield after his Sherman was destroyed, returns to the scene to direct an artillery barrage.

Sergeant Harris joins the fight with his Sherman Firefly. Proving themselves better than the German tankers in a game of cat and mouse, Harris and his gunner Mackillop light up the Panthers one by one.

Even though “one shot, one kill” tends to be the prerogative of snipers, Harris pulls it off with his Firefly, taking out five armored adversaries with an equal number of shots fired.

In spite of this, the town of Lingèvres is not securely in Allied hands until the following day.
